

David C. Cole has been deeply involved in Asia over seven decades as a teacher, researcher and economic policy advisor, most intensively in South Korea and Indonesia, but also in China, Vietnam and the Philippines. For three decades he was affiliated with the Harvard Institute for International Development and the Harvard Economics Department. He has published ten books and numerous papers on various aspects of economic development in these countries. This past year he was invited by the Korea Broadcasting System to be the “presenter” in a documentary on Korea’s economic development since independence and spent the month of May in Korea filming this four-hour documentary entitled: “Making a Miracle: 100 Years of Korean Economy.”
