

Al Funk, Class of 1992

My current role is as a director for software product development; in my role I manage a number of software developers making software for the event management industry. I would say I've put my Econ education to work by applying the broad principles I learned in Economics (and at Williams more generally). While I have strong technical skills, I didn't focus on computer science and Williams and as a result my role is broader than it would otherwise be. It has put me in a position to see the "bigger picture" within the organization, and it helped me understand the world in which a business operates. I would also say that specific Econ concepts such as analysis at the margin are directly applicable to many situations as well.
